Wolf Creek group draws several hundred to autumn muster

By Dov Restrepo · 2 September

Several hundred people attended a weekend muster held by the Wolf Creek Constitutional Regiment at a private property off Beddoe Ridge Road, north of Kettleburn. The group describes itself as a constitutional militia and says it trains for disaster response.

Dale Ransom, who uses the title colonel and has led the regiment since it formed in 2017, addressed the crowd on Saturday afternoon. Ransom told the Sentinel the regiment has “a few hundred” members across three counties and declined to give a figure.

A regiment spokesman, Curtis Ondaatje, said the weekend included first aid instruction and a vehicle recovery exercise. Asked about the group's vehicles, several of which were unmarked box trucks, Ondaatje said equipment was “loaned by supporters” and declined to say by whom.

The county sheriff's office said it had no open matters involving the group. A spokesperson for the state's civil rights office said the regiment has appeared in two of its annual surveys of armed political organisations.

Beddoe Ridge Road residents interviewed by the Sentinel described regular weekend traffic to the property and said they had not had trouble with the group.
